

LINCOLN, Neb.— Nebraska Baseball coach Will Bolt with a promising season ahead
By: Keegan Smith

Former player and current head coach of the Nebraska Cornhusker baseball team is about to start his sixth season with the team. Bolt became the head coach in June of 2019 and just recently signed a five-year contract extension that will run through the 2029 season.

"We are pleased to have Will Bolt as the leader of our baseball program well into the future. Will has been a big part of the success of Nebraska Baseball over the past two decades, not only as the head coach, but also as an assistant coach and player. Through his past experiences, he knows what it takes to win at Nebraska and has a great vision to continue to elevate our program in the coming years," stated Nebraska athletic director Troy Dannen.

In his time at Nebraska, Bolt has led the team to two Big Ten conference titles, two NCAA College World Series regional appearances, and recorded the programs 19th 40-win season. Bolt also produced four All-Americans and nine MLB draft picks, six of which were drafted in the first five rounds.

As a coach, Bolt believes that teams should be player led, and the staff should be there for support. "That's our job as coaches is to challenge them when they need it and put our arms around them when we need it," said Bolt in his press conference following the Big Ten Championship this spring.

Bolt's success was also very prevalent in his time as an assistant coach for Texas A&M. During Bolt's five years with the Aggies, they went 219-98-1 with five NCAA Regional appearances. This season at Nebraska, Bolt will have many top-tier high school and community college athletes as well as the return of several key players. There is no doubt that Bolt has the potential to lead a very successful team in the upcoming years.